Visit to Juvenile Home (Dongri):

To sensitise students about social issues, Department of lifelong learning and Extension has organised a visit to Dongri Juvenile home, a home for rehabilitation of the minor children on 4th January 2023 at 11.00 a.m. 35 students along with Professor Vaishali Bankar and Dr. Kirti Kumar Pimpliskar.

Dongri jail is a British era jail on jail road, Dongri an area in Mumbai. The jail was built by the British in the eighteenth century as on 1804. Originally located within the ramparts, building of a separate jail was first suggested by Aungler in 1671. The people initially detained here included both, Indians as well as British nationals. For instance, the Provost Marshal John Hall endured confinement in the Dongri Prison for drunk in March 1701. The majority of its inmates over time were Indians, particularly those accused of sedition (often independence fighters) or those who were in custody awaiting trial, especially at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries. It now functions as a juvenile delinquent's home for children who are below 18 years of age, convicted of crimes.

To prevent conflicts and influence, the Children in Conflict with the Law are always kept apart from the Children in Need of Care and Protection in the boys' area. They go about their daily tasks, which include praying, meditating, eating, taking part in vocational training, and engaging in leisure activities, according to a defined timetable. After being accepted into the home, a child spends 15 to 20 days in orientation, during which time the teachers work to determine his interests and create a career plan for him. The vocational programmes offered at Umer Khadi include carpentry, electrical training, mobile and computer repair, and tailoring. However, because there are only 3-4 juvenile offenders in the females' section, the juveniles and those who require protection are housed together. The girls go through a similar orientation and training process, but as part of their vocational training, they can choose to take classes in fashion design and beauty parlours. When we visited, the girls were all taking part in prayers, singing, and garba as part of the Navaratri celebrations, which were in full swing. We also learned that the boys' division had recently held a Ganpati celebration. We observed many distinctions between the girls' area and the boys' section. When we invited them to draw each other, the girls were more eager to get started and showed more interest in drawing. Additionally, they created more elaborate sketches that were filled with information and patterns. The students took keen interest in visit and asked various questions to officers of the juvenile home. The visit was successful. The students were very interested in the tour and asked the staff at the juvenile home many questions. The trip was a success.
